Art and For the Soul

Pallavi Pundir Vandana Kalra

Posted: Jan 26, 2012 at 0014 hrs IST

The Sleeping Baby

Women were cooking at it, fascinated children ran around it and babies tried to reach out for it. Australian artist Sam Jinks' hyper-real sculptures are made out of intricate materials such as fibreglass, resin, calcium carbonate and human hair. The artist looks at hyper-realism as a movement within art, given the developments in digital photography over the past 40 years. Three of his works were on display, including an untitled work—that of a baby sleeping in a crouched position, which had many looking at it in awe and disbelief.

Man as Art

Preeti Chandranakt believes that everything is a work of art, including human beings. At the fair, she had six living works of art; three each from India and Zurich. The group walked together in the corridors and during their interactions with the visitors, they shared the process of getting transformed into works of art. ‘It happened after a series of intense discussions and we followed a set of instructions,’ said one of Chandranakt’s protagonists, a Mumbai-based sales professional. The artist added, “Living works are human beings whose senses have been sharpened.”

That Afghan Girl

There was one familiar face at the India Art Fair; a face which has continued to fascinate the world for decades now. It is Sharbat Gula, the 12-year-old Afghan refugee girl who stares at you with her startling green eyes. In 1984, award-winning photojournalist Steve McCurry captured this heart-rending image in the Nasir Bagh refugee camp, Pakistan, and the image has come to symbolise the plight of refugees during the Afghanistan conflict. The image was published in 1985 and now priced at $11,000, was up for sale at the Sundaram Tagore Gallery stall, along side McCurry’s other.

Social Art

Acclaimed for his socio-political and digital work, Rashid Rana from Pakistan was being celebrated here with a project supported by Lisson Gallery and a solo show hosted by Chemould Prescott Road and Chaitanya & Lil galleries. The limited prints were in the form of a collage, where the artist put together photographs of Urdu signages. The works attracted attention as well as buyers. work, Jodhpur Fruit Vendor, which he shot in 1996.

The trojan horse from south africa

South African artist Willie Bester’s work Trojan Horse wasn’t exactly a product of the historical Trojan War. It actually came out of an incident in October 1985, when in the Emergency-declared Amiune — a Cape Town suburb — police opened fire on hundreds of unsuspecting masses while remaining hidden behind a South African Railways truck. This incident went on to be called the “Trojan Horse Massacre”, marking a turning point in the struggle against apartheid, and this also inspired Bester’s to do his Trojan Horse Massacre series in 2010. Displayed at the Robert Bowman Modern Gallery booth, and priced at Rs 1.13 crore, it was a visually powerful structure made from parts of cars and motorcycles.

Talking Heads

It was hard to miss the monumental Revinder Reddy ‘heads’ at the fair, occupying a place of pride at more than six stalls that had them in various sizes. If Vadodara Art Gallery showed his 2008 work titled Stepping Out, where a gold nude is surrounded by flowers and an alligator, Gallery Espace had Reddy’s iconic head in blue.

Scarlett Johansson? It's all Greek to me

It was surprising to see Hollywood actress Scarlett Johansson sprawled across the walls of the Frida Fine Arts Gallery booth, in a painting of course. Interestingly, the actress’ painting was mounted alongside legendary artists such as Lucian Michael Freud and Amedeo Clemente Modigliani — all done by Greek artist Jannis Markopoulos. While Scarlett-ready-mades was priced at $ 17,500, Copying Strategy Lucian-Freud was worth $8,500 and Modigliani: Scarlett Pose-For-Me for $8,500.